Rajesh Kharbanda	Interventional Cardiologist	Indirect financial	I am Chief Investigator of a randomized clinical trial testing the efficacy of routine cerebral embolic protection to reduce stroke in transcatheter aortic valve implantation (TAVI). The BHF Protect TAVI is a funded by the British Heart Foundation and Boston Scientific, through an independent investigator initiated grant for provision of devices.	11/2020	3/11/2020		Specific No action other than the process of open declaration The role of TAVI in cerebral embolic protection is not being covered by this guideline.

			Aortic stenosis is treated by transcatheter aortic valve implantation (TAVI) or surgical aortic valve replacement (AVR). TAVI is less invasive, has less morbidity and allows faster recovery than surgical AVR. However, a major risk of TAVI is stroke, which occurs in about 3% of TAVI patients, and is associated with prolonged hospital stay, disability and earlier death. Most strokes occur at the time of TAVI due to embolism of debris released from the native valve and surrounding anatomy into the cerebral circulation. It is thought that cerebral embolic protection (CEP) devices could reduce the chances of debris reaching the brain and that these devices may reduce stroke. The BHF PROTECT-TAVI trial will investigate whether CEP devices reduce the likelihood of stroke during TAVI. 7730 people having transfemoral TAVI for aortic stenosis will be recruited from across the UK. Half of the participants will be randomised to have TAVI performed with CEP. The control group will have standard of care for TAVI

			without CEP. The primary outcome will be clinical stroke at 72 hours. BHF PROTECT-TAVI will define the clinical effectiveness of CEP to reduce stroke. A cost-effectiveness analysis to inform NHS decision-making will also be undertaken. The funding for this trial is from the British Heart Foundation and from an investigator initiated grant from Boston Scientific. The funding from both sources is administered by the University of Oxford.
